

Top 10 Reasons National Parks Must Be Protected

America's national parks are arguably one of its greatest national treasures. The parks provided a variety of benefits to the American public and to the American landscape. Unlike other attractions, national parks are egalitarian. A park does not dictate how you use it, and it does not require visitors to offer up skills or money. Anyone can visit one of America's national parks for free or in exchange for a small fee.

Thus, American national parks must remain protected by the federal government. Once destroyed, the history, heritage and ecosystems cannot simply be rebuilt. If the parks were unprotected, America would see irreversible destruction that it would regret for centuries to come. Here are the top 10 reasons national parks should be protected by the federal government:

10. National Parks Protect Biodiversity

The earth itself is humankind's most precious resource. We only get one chance to use it right, and we can be certain that there are no second chances if we make too many fatal mistakes when it comes to preserving the land.

Protecting biodiversity is an essential part of working to protect our home. Biodiversity is something that has been created over the billions of years of life on this planet. It is the process that created a space for humans on the planet, and it helped ensure that the conditions were right for humans not only to survive, but to thrive.

9. National Parks Provide Leisure and Enjoyment

National Parks are essential for families! A fantastic inexpensive, healthy vacation.

National parks provide a unique opportunity for Americans and visitors alike to experience vast expanses of the great outdoors. They also provide access to a striking number of activities, none of which happen to require mobile Internet.

American parks need to be protected because they remain one of the few places that Americans have left to truly experience nature in an enjoyable and diverse manner. They showcase the best of nature before industrialization deformed our natural landscape.

8. National Parks Are Good for Our Health

National Parks are good for your health.

For 100 years, America's national parks have worked to provide places that do not only preserve history but also enrich lives. This enrichment is not only cultural, it can be physical and spiritual as well.

The parks' ability to provide enrichment in people's lives is not solely based on the space it offers. The people behind the parks have worked to ensure that the parks contribute to American health as well.

7. National Parks Are Centers of Learning

National Parks hold a wealth of knowledge. Learning does not begin and end in the classroom; however, America's national parks do happen to double as the nation's largest classrooms.

The national park system provides valuable contributions to America's education system. In addition to teaching students more about the environment, the parks offer field experiences, classroom materials and opportunities for professional development for students of all ages and backgrounds.

6. National Parks Protect the Nation's National Heritage

The natural landscape has existed since before there were people around to observe it. The stunning landscapes, beautiful forests and impressive natural formations are important parts of the country's heritage. Protecting these things should be considered part of the country's value. The best way to do this is to continue to preserve it through the national park system.

5. National Parks Promote Tourism

National Parks are a tourist's wonderland

The national park system is a vital part of the American tourism strategy because it helps make America unique as an international destination. This is a world where competitiveness in the global tourism market is constantly increasing. The U.S. needs to use every asset at its disposal to help to continue to draw record numbers of tourists every year.

Travel and tourism are an essential part of the wider American economy. In 2011 alone, 62 million international visitors travelled to the United States. These visitors help to bolster the nation's travel and tourism industry and also brought in $1.2 trillion in revenue.

4. National Parks Might Otherwise Be Destroyed by Industry

Greedy corporations would love to destroy our National Parks

Not everyone views the park system as a national treasure. In fact, some view the system as the enemy. Some industries, such as the oil industry, would like to see national parks defunded. They would also like to see the land to be sold to the highest bidder.

3. National Parks Might Be Destroyed by Foreign Invaders

Bugs, parasites and fire are just some of the threats against our National Parks

National parks face many threats. Some threats are human and others are natural. Regardless of the origin, these parks rely on the help of conservation funded by the federal government to remain alive.

2. National Parks Are Under Threat from Climate Change

Climate change is a hot topic. It concerns everyone who lives on this planet without exception. However, some of the first victims of climate change are not people. It is actually the American national parks that are taking the biggest and most visible beating right now.

Research has found that most of the national parks in America have already experienced damage from the extreme climate change that has taken place over the last few decades.

1. National Parks Can Become a Part of America's Future

Parks must be protected because our children deserve the beauty and majesty of our National Parks

The national park system may be a relatively new idea for the world. However, it has so far been an incredibly positive one. The benefits of the national park system range from spiritual benefits to preserving different biospheres across the country.
